Pedestrian Trip Through Canyons, Contiguous to Salt Lake City.

prehended in the view from the higher peaks, the exhilarating experiences of climbing, the clear and bracing atmosphere, the complete and often restful change from the commomplace and hundrum of ordinary life, the excitement of fishing and hunting, sleeping out in the woods, the genial campfire—with due precaution against its spreading into the woods, the absolute freedom of the wild, romantic life—all tend to charm and attract.

A Salt Laker took his vacation recently in this fashion—tramping through the mountains, through Farmington, City Creek, Harcscrabble, Mill creek, Bountiful and Provo canyons. The tramps were long and arduous, and there were dangers, particularly in traveling alone. But the change was so grateful from the ordinary occupation of life that physical exhaustion was not considered of serious moment. It is not necessary to travel fast; there is plenty of time, and the proverb, "Make haste slowly," fits well here in practical application. As a general thing, it is not necessary to go armed unless one wishes to shoot chickens or doyes. As for firing at a bear, should one turn up, the advice is Dont! unless you are well equipped and a dead shot. The average marksman would only wouznd a bear which would then turn on his enemy and make short work of him. The unfortunate might climb a tree, but black and brown hears can do that too, while were it a grizzly, he would grab the tree and shake it until the party treed there came flying down in a hurry; or, the bear would wait. Mountaineers of exeption, while panthers or mountain lions will crouch and wait for you to pass and not molest you unless interfered with. Rattlesnakes seem to be the only thing to be really in dread of; and in "fighting brush" it is well to keep one's optic well open for the "most insidious foe." Heavy rubber heeled shoes, leggings, clothing of a closely woven cloth, and a soft hat are an indispensible attire, to which add a heavy walking stick for use in climbing ascents. A box of lunch and bottle of coffee are also very desira PLENTY OF WATER.

PLENTY OF WATER.

The p'lgrims found the mountain streams running quite full for this time of year, furnishing plenty of water for irrigation in the flatlands below. The amount of brush is steadily increasing all along the depressions and water courses, particularly where sheep are not allowed to graze. And not only here, but along the sides of the mountains, the thickets are steadily approximating jungles, with trails disappearing. The climb up Farmington canyon was made from Lagoon. The road is open to the forks, eight miles up where the right hand road leads to the lakes, and the left hand goes up a very precipitous and rocky ascent perhaps 1,000 feet, to the high table lands in the mountain tops. This canyon is regarded by many as the steep-was accomplished in five hours from the start. There is a passable wagon road to the cabin at the left after dropping over the first small divide, a poor wagon road to the trail turning sharply to the left further on to ascend the steep hill there, while beyond there is only a horse trail most to the divide, and a poor horse trail at that.

SHEEP ON THE RANGE.

There are 15,000 sheep scattered along the range, guarded by a dozen camps of herders. These have fairly well cleaned out the brush there, and if they could only be turned down the canyons, they would do a much-to-be-desired work, For three miles in Hardscrabble there is no continuous trail; it is thick, almost impenetrable brush—just the place for the lairs of wild animals, so that every few hundred feet prospecting for any sort of a trail is necessary. However, a wagon trail is necessary. However, a wagon trail is met with further down, and from there on the walking is good clear into the Weber valley.

WHY NOT A WAGON ROAD?

WHY NOT A WAGON ROAD? WHY NOT A WAGON ROAD?

There is no reason why there should not be a good wagon road between Salt Lake and Morgan. In 1893, the Morgan county commissioners offered to build to the divide if Salt Lake would fix up the City creek end of the route. Councilmen E. E. Rich, C. E. Wantland and Judge Loofbourow made a strong fight for the improvement, showing that the Morgan county people were anxious to drive into Salt Lake with their market products and to do their trading here est in the state, and it is as rocky and hard to travel in as it is steep. An ankle can be easily sprained here. The scenery is west may be a seen to see the south of may look back and see the south or part of the great take with the wide expanse of alkali flats once covered by the water, but now dry. The mountains beyond make a pleasant picture. There are a number of prespects on the sides of the upper hills, but evidently not much is being done there—for want of capital. To make steady, but water, but of capital. To make steady, but water, but of capital in the steady to declare that the man who believes the Union Pacific road will ever try to make the much talked of call of the point is lupressive, with the beautiful value of the Weber, Round valley, and the East Canyon valley lying spread out before the gaze, with the high hills as a background. Morgan, Hortercile, and adjoining towns are plainly in sight, 10 or 15 miles away, meetting in groups of trees. The general view includes "magnificent did down that canyon, and on to Porterville, and adjoining towns are plainly in sight, 10 or 15 miles away, meetting in groups of trees. The general view includes "magnificent did down that canyon, and on to Porterville and Morgan City." The rest of the Weber valley. The return was accomplished in two hours, with a big dinner at Lagoon to replenish the wasted and enervated inner man.

The traum through City Creek continued over the Hardserabble alivided down that canyon, and on to Porterville and Morgan City. The general view includes and one-half miles further, and to the top of City Creek divide it is 14 miles. This last was accomplished in five hours from the start. engineer." Recollections of this most lovely sheet of water have inspired the following:

Surpasses them all, this Bridal Veil fall! With its cascades of silver sheen,

As they glitter and dash with a hing-ing splash, Past the tops of the evergreens. A marvel all is this Bridal Veil fall,

Leaping the crests in play,
And bounding down with a rushing sound On the rockribbed mountain gray,

It sparkles bright in the golden light Of the sunbeams' glinting rays, New forms it takes as the water breaks Into invidescent sparks. Into irridescent sprays.

Note the rainbow hues in the curlicues, Of violet, red and green,
Of yellow and blue, rich colors true
To the bow in the heavens seen.

190 feet drops the lustrous sheet Likewie veil of a giant bride: To be the worn, as of Persian lawn, The source of mountain pride.

From the rocks below whence the ters flow

To the canyon's rustling stream, The mists disclose two resplendent bows In varicolored gleam.

Comic Incident of a Storm Bound Camp on Island Caught By Camera Man.

Tragedy of Great Salt Lake-Whothrew the tomato?

HAT Great Salt Lake is a body | other immediately after. of water upon whose bosom restive storms create tragedies of insular maroonings is an opinion often given prominence through the activity of landsmen reporters when once a stupidly built beat, manned by landlubbers of the most inexperienced sort, faces the problem of running through a spell

To prove that the lake has also its comedies a correspondent has forwarded the pictures shown with this article. They were taken of a stormbound party on Antelope island, one before a tomato was thrown, and an-

The psychologists among the 'News' readers will, of course, recfore" and which "after:" When the party which brought about this bit of salt water comedy went out upon the lake, it sailed a small vacht, carried water for a week, provender for a cruise, an anchor for a storm, and a yachtsman for the helm, with oars and a row boat to use in case of any snapping of the boom or blowing away of the jib, or tearing loose of the rudder, or shivering of the timber, which are things that happen, according to Hazle, if wind and wave combine in too angry a movement of combine in too angry a movement o opposition.

Knowing that storms blow past, just as they blow up, instead of getting terrified when a big breeze stiffened into a gale sweeping down from Bear River bay, to Stainsbury, and east across the open water to Saltair, this particular party headed for shelter.

Shelter in this case meant anywhere along the lee shore of Antelope island, and it was in running the craft across the storm's path—for it was hugging Stainsbury when things became serious—that the original of the first picture shown became tired. Once in quict water, he hauled in his sail, and after anchoring to let the storm have its way, went quietly to sleep on the beach.

Others in the party, however, who were not tired, did not feel like sleep, and finally discovered that their companion was altogether too comfortable with the sail pulled over him for cover.

There was nothing in camp but a ripe tomatoe, or that might not have a storm broke on the leeward shore of Antelope is the theme, delicately developed it is true, in the second illustration.

The object of sending the pictures to the "News" in the mind of its correspondent, was to illustrate the fact that laying-over through a swell as tragic incident, and that given a crew that will not worry when there is no cause to do so, at forced traving on an island may be thorous.
